Highlights

- There could be additional hospitalization or treatment costs depending on a number of factors including whether the bill (1) identifies individuals, who would have eventually received treatment under current law, earlier or (2) generates new cases. If new cases are generated, state and local public health entities could realize costs.
- The probate divisions of the courts of common pleas should be able to utilize existing staffing levels and appropriated funds to absorb any work and costs created by additional hearings related to involuntary treatment for mental illness.

Detailed Analysis

Existing Ohio law establishes a process under which certain health professionals or law enforcement officers may initiate an individual's involuntary treatment for mental illness when an emergency exists. The bill changes the definition of a "mentally ill person subject to a court order" in two ways: (1) by eliminating the requirement that a person must represent a substantial risk of physical harm to self or others if allowed to remain at liberty, and (2) expanding the definition to include a person who represents a substantial risk of harm to self or others as manifested by behavior that indicates:

- that the person's judgement is impaired by a lack of understanding of having an illness or need for treatment;
- the person refuses or is not adhering to prescribed treatments; and
- the person is reasonably expected to suffer mental deterioration based on prior history, and, as a result, is expected to then meet the standards under the current law definition.

Probate courts

Because of the bill, there may be an increase in the number of probate court hearings involving an individual's involuntary treatment for mental illness when an emergency exists. For the ten-year period covering calendar years 2011 through 2020, probate courts reported an average of 85,980 incoming cases statewide per year, of which 6,129, or 7.1%, involved civil commitments.¹ The increase in hearings is not expected to be significant; some cases may be heard earlier under the bill than they otherwise would have been under current law. The courts will likely be able to utilize existing staffing levels and appropriated funds to absorb any additional work and related costs.

Treatment costs

The bill could result in additional emergency hospitalization and treatment costs. When contacted, both the Ohio Department of Mental Health and Addiction Services (OhioMHAS) and the Ohio Association of County Behavioral Health Authorities (OACBHA) were uncertain of the bill's impact at this time. However, OACBHA stated that the impact will primarily depend on if the bill (1) generates new cases or (2) identifies individuals, who would have eventually received involuntary treatment under current law, earlier. If cases are identified and treatments are rendered earlier, it is possible that some stabilization and treatment costs might actually be reduced. If there are new cases generated, the costs will depend on the number of such cases, the scope of treatments rendered, and insurance reimbursements or patient contributions received. OhioMHAS regional psychiatric hospitals (RPH) could realize an increase in costs, as could any public hospitals that provide care. These costs would depend on any insurance reimbursements or patient contributions received.² Private insurance, Medicare, and Medicaid could reimburse for medically necessary treatment or hospitalizations. In cases in which insurance was unavailable, patients could be charged. In addition, some county alcohol, drug addiction, and mental health services (ADAMHS) boards may pay some emergency hospitalization costs, if funds are available, for indigent patients in certain circumstances. ADAMHS boards could also realize costs to establish emergency and crisis care plans for residents impacted by the bill or to reimburse for any additional assessments required.

HB0439IN/lb

¹ Civil commitment data reported by the Supreme Court includes all commitments under R.C. Chapter 5122 of which emergency commitments are a subset.

² There are currently six OhioMHAS regional psychiatric hospitals. The inpatient daily rate in CY 2021 for all payors ranged from about $537 to $804.
